

If Insured, Sometimes You Should Pretend You Don't Have Health Insurance

by Annie Margarita Yang

Hi everyone,

A couple months back, my friend had to get a Td vaccine to get some paperwork filled out. His university's health center didn't offer it, so we had to look elsewhere. The medical clinic filling out the paperwork recommended we go to the City of Lubbock Health Department, which is a community health center in Lubbock. The clinic personnel specifically instructed my friend to state that he did not have health insurance, even though he did, so that he would only be charged $15.00 for the Td vaccine.

I thought this was weird, but okay. We went to the City of Lubbock Health Department and told the employee at the front desk that my friend did not have health insurance. The department charged him $15.00 and we waited in the seating area.

While we were waiting, a young couple entered the building. The female was only 18 years old and the male was 19 years old. They both had to get the vaccine for Meningitis and they both had private health insurance. The employee then said, "Okay, that will be $120.00 from each of you." I could tell the couple looked surprised, because of the high cost, but they had to pay anyway. They looked stressed.

Finally, we were called inside. While my friend was getting his Td vaccine, I got a bit snoopy. I wanted to learn more about the office. Maybe there were things I could learn just from looking around.

On the back wall next to the doctor's desk was a laminated sheet of paper displaying the prices for vaccines. Here is a picture of that exact sheet:

Pre-exposure Rabies vaccine can be ordered as needed. Pricing varies.

Do you see what is wrong here? For every adult with no health insurance, every single vaccine cost $15.00. But for adults with health insurance, the vaccines cost between 166% to 700% more.

This is outrageous. The young couple in the waiting room could have saved $210.00 just by saying, "We don't have health insurance." They are young. The money could really help. To top it off, they have private health insurance. They pay monthly premiums, the health insurance doesn't even cover the vaccines, and they also pay more for the vaccine itself, compared to someone without insurance.

Something is definitely wrong with the system. The community health center had the price list inside the doctor's office, yet they didn't hang it up in the lobby for patients to see when they walked in. I bet they do have a contract with the health insurance companies dictating how much they have to charge.

I want people to understand that while health insurance is can be a good thing, sometimes it pays to not even use it. This system is so complex though, that it's hard to figure out when those moments should be.

I've read lots of stories on the Internet of people with health insurance getting charged more for surgeries and procedures than if they simply claimed uninsured and paid cash outright. Check out these articles:

The health insurance company is not on your side. They are in the business of milking as much money out of you as possible and paying out the least amount possible. Otherwise, they will go out of business.

I just wish there were more TRANSPARENCY about the prices each doctor/hospital charges for each exam/procedure with and without health insurance. Look, I went to Mexico in May. I literally shopped online for a dental cleaning the same way I shop for everything else! Why is it so difficult in the United States to find out the price?!

I don't have the answer. I just wish the country could reach a solution that is both simple and effective.
